All civilized people deplore war. It seems so brutal, so unnecessary that as the years go by the horror of it is impressed more and more strongly upon the public mind. We are optimistic enough to believe that in a time not very far distant, perhaps within the lifetime of children already born, there will be no such thing as war.

Looks as if the old adage will have to be changed to: When Greek meets Murrayite then comes the tug of war.

We really don't see much use in the first place and shart shows some interesting facts. In the first place, out of a total number of twenty-three cold winters, six were followed by winters of average temperature and eight by comparatively warm winters. Also, it shows that as a rule, few very coll winters are followed consecutively by relatively warm winters. This is, the chances are, that the severe winter of last year will very likely be succeeded this year by a winter. The table also indicates that changes in

A few years ago I was taking a country walk in Kovno. The road lay through a dense forest and the day was oppressively hot. I arrived, at last, at a cross-road, and sat down under the shade of the trees to rest. A signpost pointed its two arms down the converging roads. On one of them was inseribed "14 versts to Janova." on the other, "17 versts to Shadowa." Presently the creaking of wheels and the slow "clop. clop" of a horses hoofs on the road behind roused me. A cart piled high with tinware was coming down the road with the driver terched on the top of the load. "Good day, brother. I called out, as the cart with its sorry horse came abreast of me. The man picked up the bit of cord which served as reins, and prepared to go on.

"I shall leave that to my horse," he answered callously.

The lumbering wagon moved off and finally passed out of sight down the Janova road, which the horse had selecyted to take.

The frequent use of the word blank to signify—well, what each person supplies for himself when he reads of a "blankety blank blank fool," leads one to feel a curious shock on coming across the word used in a legitimate sense. For instance, here is the way in spoils the first stanza of Keats' "Hymn to Apollo":

And of the golden bow.
And of the golden hair,
And of the golden hair,
And of the golden fire,
Charloteer,
Round the patient year,
Where—where slept thine ire,
When, like a blank idiot, I put on thy wreath.
